Assessing the Effectiveness of International Courts: A Goal-Based Approach Yuval Shany	225
This article discusses selected social science approaches to organizational effectiveness and explains why a goal-based definition of effectiveness is suitable for evaluating international court performance. The proposed model offers new analytical tools for understanding the goals set for international courts by their mandate providers (the states and international organizations that create and supervise international courts) and for assessing how key concepts relating to the structure, process, and outcomes of international courts—for example, judicial independence, judgment compliance, and judicial legitimacy—contribute to their effectiveness.
Jurisprudence of the Foreign Claims Settlement Commission: Albania Claims David J. Bederman	271
Under the program established through a 1995 U.S.-Albania agreement, and with funds provided by the Albanian government, the Foreign Claims Settlement Commission compensated U.S. nationals for losses resulting from acts of the Albanian government that occurred before the end of Communist rule in 1991. This article provides an overview of the claims awarded and denied, analyzes the difficulties posed for dual nationals by the Agreed Minute appended to the original agreement, and discusses the lessons to be learned from the jurisprudence of the Albanian program.

The Empirical Turn in International Legal Scholarship Gregory Shaffer and Tom Ginsburg	1
This article presents and assesses a new wave of empirical research on international law. Recent scholarship has moved away from theoretical debates over whether international law “matters” and focuses instead on exploring the conditions under which international law is created and produces effects. As this empirical research program has matured, it has allowed for new, midlevel theorizing that we call “conditional international law theory.”
Political Science Research on International Law: The State of the Field Emilie M. Hafner-Burton, David G. Victor, and Yonatan Lupu	47
Political scientists are actively engaged in research on many aspects of international law and organizations. This article reviews the key theories and empirical findings that have emerged over the last two decades of that research program. The aim, in addition to a comprehensive review and assessment, is to outline an agenda for collaboration between political scientists and international lawyers on topics that will advance the state of the art in both fields.
